poolpaintings.com Arthur Robins

Making his home in New York City, Robins has observed and painted various manifestations of this metropolis. Distorted viewpoints, bold outlines and vigorous strokes characterize his emotional response to subject matter such as billiard halls, parks, city streets and the many faces that inhabit them. From sketches and drawings made "on the spot," Robins transfers visual stimuli to painting via his imagination.

Expressionism in art occurs when the artist feels so deeply about and identifies with an object, situation or setting, that he or she conveys that emotional reaction. The subject becomes a structure for hanging sentiment.

Robin's depictions of pool players include an environment - the pool parlor and its denizens. Often from overhead, he pictures the players in the act of shooting. His knowledge of this game informs the players' positions and ball formations. The two - players and balls - are the most prominent elements in these depictions. The distorted angles used by the artist are echoed in the angle of the pool players' shots. The geometry of the game as well as the players' concentration are translated into a painting suggesting the intensity of a moment.
